Tasting Panel

Not long ago, critics and reviewers were complaining—with justification—that California Pinots were generally becoming too rich and chunky at the cost of the delicacy that has long been the variety's primary virtue. Clearly the message got through, as the stylistic center of gravity has shifted back toward lithe wines with less wood and more moderate ripeness and weight. This is a superb object lesson in that shift, showing subtly spicy aromas, satisfyingly impactful flavors within a truly light body, and fine-grained tannins that offer a bit of grip on the finish. It's especially impressive at its price point.

Wine Spectator

A nice streamlined, mineral-tinged version, with racy acidity running underneath blood orange and raspberry coulis flavors, while savory and hibiscus hints chime in on the finish, where the fruit lingers prettily.

Wine Enthusiast

A tempting cherry-chocolate aroma and warm, plummy flavors make this full-bodied and moderately tannic wine broadly appealing. The slightly chewy texture nicely backs up the ripe, cooked berry and plum flavors for great balance.
